EDITS HIS PAPERS FROM JAIL.

EX-BANKER JEWETT ABOUT TO SEEK A PARDON.

in the Years He Rose From a Furniture tierk to a Wizard of Finance-Then He Was Convicted of Misappropriating Money-Has Three Newspapers.

LAWRENCE, Mass., Jan. 31.—The only man the United States who from a prison cell edits a group of daily and Sunday papers s about to petition President Roosevelt for a pardon on the ground of ill health. He is William S. Jewett, editor and publisher the Lawrence Morning Sun, Evening tmericen and Sunday Sun, and local agent or the Boston dailies. He was committed to prison some two years ago, having been convicted of violating the Federal Banking law. Under his management the papers

Jewett is believed to be the first man in the United States at least to manage a group of papers while in prison, To be sure there have been cases in which editors in New Jersey and Texas have done business while awaiting trial for some infraction of the law, but so far as is known here none ever continued business after conviction. But then Jewett was always

When after a long fight the United States Supreme Court decided that his conviction of violating the Bunking law must stand, the people of Lawrence thought his days as a power here were over and a syndicate made him an offer for his papers. He refused point blank.

"What are you going to do with them?" asked the agent. "You might as well take these terms. Anyway they're no good to "The devil you say," said Jewett, then on his way to prison. "I'm going to keep them and run them. You may have inside information, but I guess I'm not going side information, but I guess I'm not going to be hanged. I'm coming out in five years at the most and I'll need them then. If I decide to sell meanwhile I'll let you know. The agent, himself a practical man, was dumfounded at Jewett's proposals, but the latter knew what he was doing. As he neared the city—he had been taken into custody in Boston—he asked the deputy marshal to allow him to eat supper in one of the hotels. There he met the heads of f the hotels. There he met the heads of lepartments of his papers, and gave instrucions for the next day's issues. Two hours prison walls. Since that night he has seen one or more of his managers daily, discussed office problems with them, dictated the editorial policy on this subject or that, advised as to advertising contracts and as to the support of one candidate or another for local office.

As to supporting candidates his policy was always clear. Never did he allow a line to appear that would indicate a feeling of bitterness on his part. Some men who had been bitter enemies of his in his fight for reedom received his support as much from his desire to appear fair as to aid the nominees of his party. His standing notice to all was: "Do nothing that will make people think I am using my papers to get quare. Bun them as business propositions and I'll take care of myself."

Jewett's feat appears the more remarkable when one considers that he is a comparative novice in the newspaper business, entering tafter he had become a banker. Ten years t after he had become a banker. Ten years ago Jewett stood as one of the most remarkable bankers in Massachusetts. Starting without a dollar of his own five years before, he had bought control of six national banks and elected himself president of each. To all intents and purposes he was a trader in banks and as a side show ran what was practically a school for bank clerks where he taught young men the art of banking preparatory to making them cashiers in his institutions. Then, it has been declared, his check was good for $1,000,000; but he was never really solvent, his enemies say.

Jewett's start as a banker came when at the age of 15 he entered the Pemberton National Bank as a messenger. There he stayed two years, amazing all who came in contact with him by his fazulty for mathematics.

He left the bank to clerk in his father's store, but after a while the work became monotonous and he evolved the scheme which was destined to make him noted and monotonous and he evolved the scheme which was destined to make him noted and sventually a convict. The more he studied the scheme the better it appeared from his knowledge of banking, and without waiting to have the approval of others he bade farewell to the furniture business.

To a banker prominent in the church and in politics he unfolded his scheme. In substance it was to buy stock in old banks having a good surplus, elect himself president, put the bank into liquidation and divide the surplus with the stockholders. The more the plan was considered the better it looked, and the banker decided to try it. Jewett started out with a bundle of money and barrels of confidence. He quietly bought up stock of the Methuen National Bank, and when the directors awoke they found him in control. They feared to have him, scarcely more than a boy, in charge of their bank, so they decided to buy him off. They made an offer for his stock, much more than he had paid for it, but his price was far above theirs. They finally gave his price.

Jewett retired and the syndicate felt that its prospects were looking up. The deal had presented a new phase of the deal had presented a new phase of the scheme.

From Methuen it was but a step to Haverhill, where the Easex National Bank was marked for operation Jewett quietly secured enough of the stock to elect himself president. The bank then held only $59,000 of depositors' money in less than a year it had deposits of more than $400,000, and its capital stock had trebied in value.

Jewett was now beginning to be recognized as "a wizard of finance." Everything his touched turned to money. Men sought his aid and financiers followed his counsel. Rapid in calculation, resourceful in business, he was a brilliant figure in the world of money.

Then Jewett founded the Arlington Bank of Lawrence. Easex street was lined posits, inaugurated up-to-date methods of business and affairs began to boom The bank was sound and the directory eminently respectable.

Across the street from the Arlington was the Pemberton National Bank, a pioneer institution of the city. Its invested capital was $150,000, undivided profits $150,000 and it had deposits of $400,000. The directors were surprised one morning to find Jewett in possession of the bank. He had bought enough stock to give him control.

At first he was welcomed to the directory, for it was thought his connection would increase the bank's value, and he was elected president at a salary of $6,000 a year. This was the top notch of his meteoric career, for he was now head of five banks, which paid him in salaries close to $25,000 a year and he was not yet 30.

Up to this time he was a hard, untiring worker. Now he began to relax a bit. Finally he took a trip to Europe.

When he returned his uncloing began. In the first place the directors of the Arlington objected to his managing two banks in the same city. He retired and devoted himself to the Pemberton. Then he lost money in outside enterprises. One of the biggest outside schemes he went into was the purchase of a steamship line. It was unloaded upon him at a high figure and for three months he ran it at a loss of $1,000 a day. Then he sold out at a big loss.

The agent for a Kansas City house came on to-float bonds. He caught Jewett for $40,000 and later the banker used the paper to cover the walls of his office. It is there yet. The Pemberton Bank was involved in both of these schemes and the syndicate winced at the blows

About this time he began to meet trouble in other quarters in the form of public attacks, and he decided to buy a paper to use as a club. He paid a fancy price for a paper here, added a morning and a Sunday edition and began to boom the property, using it to defend himself and his schemes.

Early in 1891 he decided to close the Pemberton Bank. Its securities went over to the Arlington had swallowed its aged rival Arlington had swallowed us aged whole.

The deal that proved his undering came next in the purchase of the Lake National at Wolfboro, N. H. The bank was capitalized at $50,000, and in its report it placed the undivided profits at $100,000. When Jewett took control he found that worthless paper more than wiped out this balance. In other words, he had bought a gold brick. But he said nothing.

The day after securing control he borrowed $10,000 from the Arlington National, putting up Lake National stock for security.

putting up Lake National stock for security.

In put the bank into liquidation, appointed himself agent, sold the bank pudding packed the securities in his grip and came home, leaving behind a lot of projecting creditors. He continued to wind up the affairs of the bank until the New Hampshi s victims had a receiver appointed. A bankers now without a bank, he devoted himself to his newspapers. The Arlington began to press on the $10,000 note. Jewett laughed at its officers and lefted them. Then they turned on him.

As liquidating agent for the Lake bank is had falled to pay the Arlington dividends had falled to pay the Arlington dividends in the stock he had placed with it; therefore, c was charged with misappropriation of funds, a rested and held for the Federal grand July in $25,000 bonds. OPPOSED TO COMFORT STATION. Brooklyn Merchants May Fight Presiden Swanstrom's Plan.

So far from having acquiesced in the plans of Borough President Swanstrom for the erection of a public comfort station on the triangular plaza at the junction of Fulton street and Flatbush avenue, Brooklyn, the merchants whose stores adjoin that spot merchants whose stores adjoin that spot are pronounced in their opposition to it. The firms principally interested in the matter are William Wise & Son, the Cow-perthwait Company, Journeay & Burnham, the B. G. Latimer & Son Company and William Berri's Sons. All these firms were represented at a public hearing before President Swanstrom and Supt. Helmle of the Bureau of Public Buildings last Thurs-day.

After the hearing a statement was given to the newspapers that the objections of these firms had been overcome by President Swanstrom, who had proved to them that the proposed comfort station would in no way be obnoxious. The truth of 'h's statement was emphatically denied yesterday by B. G. Latimer, senior member of the firm bearing his name; President Hugh Boyd of Journeay & Burnham; William Wise and others.

Mr. Latimer was particularly strenuous in his objections and declared that he would not stop his opposition until he had exhausted every legal means for preventing the erection of the station. His store is the nearest to the spot chosen by President Swanstrom. Should Mr. Latimer take the matter into the courts he will have the support of all the other business men in that district.

Being an artilleryman myself, I was, of course, interested in Royal Field Artillery, and they certainly know how to drill. If and they certainly know how to drill.
